

Below is "The Tailor and The Elephant" In the evening, the elephant would go to a pond every day to take a dip. On the way to the pond, the elephant used to stop at a tailor's shop and raise his trunk to greet the shop owner. The tailor used to offer bananas to the elephant every day. The elephant used to thank the tailor by raising his trunk, gulping the banana down, and then walking away.

One day the tailor was not in a good mood, as he had a quarrel with a customer. In the evening, when the elephant came to greet the tailor and stretched his trunk to collect a banana, the tailor pricked the elephant with a needle. The elephant cried in pain while the tailor laughed loudly.

The following day, as usual, the elephant went to the pond for a bath. On his way back, he stopped at another pond that had muddy water. The elephant then started walking purposefully to the tailor's shop. The tailor was occupied with his work. He had stitched several clothes and had neatly arranged them after ironing the clothes. The tailor was admiring his work when he saw the elephant standing outside the shop with his trunk raised. Then the elephant sent forth a spray of muddy water and drenched the tailor's newly-stitched and ironed clothes.

The tailor was completely left in shock. He joined his hands in salutation and said to the elephant,
